Critical Theory has long been oriented around both a mechanistic view of nature and the centrality of the subject position. Recently, theorists have developed “speculative realism” to attempt to point out the limitations of Critical Theory’s subject-centered perspective and its focus on transcendental as opposed to metaphysical questions. Their interventions have established a new set of questions for Critical Theory that go to the heart of some of its primary commitments. This one-day workshop will grapple with some of the questions this speculative turn has generated including Catherine Malabou’s call for a new version of the transcendental and a re-elaboration of our relationship to Kantianism.
